Ever wondered why your home desktop looks so much different from your laptop? If you have, then there are a number of things that come to mind, but there is one simple answer for the matter: you are at home. At your workplace, you will have a more uniform setup that differs from the one at home. In fact, it's not as hard as you think to get your desktops looking as one does at home. Most laptops, tablets and smartphones come with few applications at their disposal. This leaves the user with very few applications to choose from. This can easily be fixed by adding as many applications as possible. Most of the times, the only requirement is that the software must be free. 1. For productivity If you are a multi-tasker, then it's important to have a multitude of applications at your disposal. Ideally, you should have three main applications at your disposal: a spreadsheet, a word processor, and a database. The last one needs to be one that you can easily access and understand. OpenOffice databases are a great example. Once you have a database, you can easily make new forms and reports. Many of them come pre-installed on a number of operating systems. If you are a consumer who is always on the go, it's best to have an e-mail client. Most smartphones come with an e-mail client, but there are other options such as Outlook Express. Windows users have many options, but what's important is that the client must be able to sort e-mails and folders. For better productivity, it's important to have some form of scheduling and productivity tools. Google Calendar or Entourage are the options for Windows users. 2. For home Although at home, you should have a high-performance desktop, you should still have a number of applications at your disposal. Some of the common applications you should have at home include: internet browser, social media, and office software. To get the best productivity from your desktop, you should install a word processor. One of the best options is Microsoft Office. To access online documents and spreadsheets, you should install Chrome, Firefox or Internet Explorer. A PDF file viewer is also something that many users should have at home. 3. For games We all know that gaming is a big part of the PC experience. While gaming at home is a bit different than at a gaming center, there are a few important features that should be in place to have a great gaming experience. Firstly, the computer should have good hardware. It's always best to buy a high-quality computer that does not require a lot of power to run. To get a better experience, you should have a good video card.
